FARMERS, CUSTOMERS, CROPS ANXIOUS FOR SEASON TO HEAT UP

By Steve Jensen, Office of DoAg Commissioner Steven K. Reviczky

Struggling to reach more than a few inches high, the green lettuce in Nelson Cecaelli's fields tells the story of a slow spring growing season that has left Connecticut farmers anxious for both the temperatures and retail markets to heat up.

"It's not so much the days, but the cold nights are just killing us," Cecaelli said late last week as he supervised a crew planting at his Northford farm. "This lettuce is alive and healthy but it just can't get going the way it should."

Cecaelli planted the first crop of lettuce on April 5 in a hilltop field that typically sees less frost than the lower ones. But some of the leaves still suffered "tip burn" from the chilly nights.

And it's not only the plants that are being stunted by the cold – it's also tamping down business.

Joe DeFrancesco, whose farm is just a few miles from Cecaelli's, was one of only a handful of growers at the Hartford Regional Farmers' Market last weekend that began with a cold, rainy Saturday.

"As far as sales go, we're at least two or three weeks behind because of the weather," he said. "I'm still advising my customers to only plant cold-weather tolerant," varieties.

With more than seven acres of greenhouses in production, DeFrancesco is not as tied to the weather as some growers.

The mind-boggling expanse of flowers and bedding plants and hanging baskets in his greenhouses are in prime shape for sale at farmers' markets and at the Stew Leonard's chain he has been supplying for 28 years.

The Hartford market typically picks up steam as Mother's Day approaches, and DeFrancesco predicts that pent-up desire to get the season underway is about to explode – for customers and for growers.

The greenhouses at DeFrancesco Farm are packed with colorful stock that will soon be available at garden centers and farmers' markets.

"I think the next two weekends will be crazy as usual," he said.

There will be approximately 130 farmers' markets around the state this season – double from a decade ago - with about ten opening this weekend. The Hartford market has more than 50 growers signed up.

Cecaelli said farmers' markets have become an increasingly vital part of his business.

This season, he will sell at markets in Durham, New Haven and two in Bridgeport. Markets in urban areas have proven to be popular with city residents who may not otherwise have access to farm-fresh products.

He also has adapted some of his crops to meet demand at the markets.

For instance, he now plants about 3 acres of sugar-snap peas preferred by busy customers because the whole pod can be tossed in boiling water without having to shell them.

"People don't have the time to do that anymore," he said.

DOAG RECEIVES GRANT TO IMPROVE ANIMAL REHABILITATION FACILITY IN NIAN TIC

The John T. and Jane A. Wiederhold Foundation has granted the Dept. of Agriculture more than $50,000 to make improvements to its Niantic facility where horses and other large animals seized in neglect cases are rehabilitated for public adoption.

The $51,600 grant will be used to build new paddock and pasture fences and purchase equipment such as stall mats, horse blankets, a hot water heater and veterinary items used in the Second Chance program.

Located at York Correctional Facility in Niantic, the Second Chance program is a collaboration between the Dept. of Agriculture and the Dept. of Correction. Inmates from York volunteer to work with the animals in partnership with agency personnel.

“For 11 years this program has proven to be beneficial for both the animals and the inmates,” said Dept. of Agriculture Commissioner Steven K. Reviczky. “The support of the Wiederhold Foundation is very much appreciated and will help us continue to give the animals the care they deserve.”

The Wiederhold Foundation was created in 2012 to protect and improve the welfare of animals of all kinds. The grant was received through the Community Foundation of Northwest Connecticut.

Anyone interested in adopting an animal through the Second Chance program should contact Animal Control Officer Linda Wenner at 860-713-2567 or Linda.Wenner@ct.gov.
