The Department of Agriculture is recruiting for a full-time Environmental Analyst 1. The Department of Agriculture, Aquaculture Division, administers the National Shellfish Sanitation Program in CT under the review of the U.S. Food & Drug Administration. The program standardizes the regulation and inspection of shellfish growing areas, harvest, storage and production facilities, as well as the wholesale markets, in addition to the shipment of shellfish between all states in an attempt to protect public health and safety. Duties include: inspect, educate, license, monitor and regulate the commercial shellfish industry and raw shellfish product in order to ensure that consumption of the product will not negatively impact or affect the public health and safety under guidelines developed and administered by the FDA. Requires work assignments be performed on small boats year-round in Long Island Sound.

Preferred candidates will have: fieldwork experience related to marine biology or biology; boating experience; knowledge of environmental issues of Long Island Sound; knowledge of or work experience with geographic information systems; knowledge, familiarity, or experience with the laws, statutes, and regulations relevant to the agency's responsibilities in inspecting, educating, licensing, monitoring, and regulating the commercial shellfish industry and raw shellfish product; ability to follow oral and written instructions. Public health or environmental health background, particularly experience in performing sanitary inspections of facilities would be valuable. Educational background in marine biology, coastal studies, or public health is helpful.
